Hi,

I had thought about that too, but I've got viruses from transferring drives between computers and wouldn't want to risk that. Though you could provide your own drive, as long as it hadn't been used yet and still enclosed in its original packaging. Would that work? Our total data is about 100mb.

Or if you found an appropriate flash drive you wanted to use, let us know the model, capacity, online retailer, etc. and we could purchase as long as we were reimbursed the cost.

On the dropbox transfer links, I'm a bit of dinosaur on tech stuff and uncomfortable using it. I feel like it would take a fair amount of my time to learn it and transferring data via flash drive would not.

Aaron

Good morning, Aaron.

As a compromise with the flash drive issue why don't I just give you a flash drive and you can put the data on that? That way, you get to use flash drives which for some undisclosed reason you think are best, and I get to pay you the actual direct cost of copying the data, which is nothing. I can bring it with me when I come inspect the hard copy material.

Let me know,
